When I met Heyoka Merrifield in 1975, I was taken by his art and jewelry. The pieces he has made for me have become part of my life and travel with me wherever I go, especially the miniature shrine to Lord Ganesha. Not a gem nor precious metal passes through Heyoka’s hands that is not instilled with a spirit of its own in the process of being transformed into a work of art and beauty.

- George Harrison
Prologue

I feel we were all created to live on Earth as one family and to manifest our own individual journey gifted to us by our parents, Mother Earth and the Great Mystery. In our Earth Walk, it is intended that we discover that gift we were meant to bring to our family. Early in my search for my special Earth journey, Sacred Art awakened my heart creating amazing joy in my life. I realized step by step that we all have our own unique gift to Creation that will benefit All Our Relations. When we find that gift, it is meant to be our give-away, benefiting our family for many generations. Perhaps this story of a young artist's search for a way to create art like that of our great ancestral masters will help you to find your own sacred path leading to your destiny.

Dedication

This book is dedicated to my grandchildren, Siena, Rowan, Amaro, and to all the future grandchildren of our world
Toward the end of last year, a sentence often kept coming to my mind and it sounded like the title of a book – The Path of Sacred Art. I had several projects in the works and tried to forget about it, but the title kept coming back and refused to go away.

Later, when reading a few poems I had written that year, the book title was found in a line from the poem Autumn Kiss. I decided I could not escape the message when I realized it was an important and meaningful part of my life’s journey. Also, it was wrong to say “no” to the muse’s inspiration.
Autumn Kiss

An autumn kiss touching the trees
    Giving them a golden aura

Walking along the verdant path
    Holding hands in silence

In sadness my lover and I
    Feeling the possible closure

Our relationship may be over
    Ending years of love and bliss

In ceremony sitting by the river
    Sharing the sacred pipe

No words for what I'm feeling
    In the smoke my heart speaks

Gratitude for our time together
    Reaching for our highest good

Open to changes that are best
    For our spirit's earth walk

An evening of shared touching
    Opens again a way together

The path to sacred awakening
    The path of sacred art

May lead to a place together
    Of our heavenly oneness
Finding A Path

It is the autumn in the season of my birth 77 years ago – the time of starting this story: The Path of Sacred Art.

My father taught me that in some future day I would go into the sky where the streets are paved with gold. Today, the golden aspen leaves of Fall cover the trail I walk upon and are manifesting with their beauty of that heaven my father described. Mother Nature opens her and Father Sky’s creation when I walk into the mountain canyon near my home. I feel in this beautiful image the birth of all art. Throughout history, artists have tried to capture the oneness of our radiant Mother Earth and the Great Mystery Father Spirit.

My memories take me to a cave in Southern France where I entered into a sacred Paleolithic cathedral. Upon the walls were paintings of the animals that gave our ancestors their food, clothing, and shelter. I could feel the love and appreciation in these wonderful works of art. They were the oldest paintings I had ever viewed and they touched my heart with their power and beauty. They are the first art that our ancestors have given to us and they definitely are celebrating the sacred within the animals with which they shared their existence. I could feel the ceremonies in that cave that happened tens of thousands of years ago. It was the same way of honoring life as my Native American community does in its celebration of the sacredness of the animal powers.

In our sundance ceremony, we dance our prayers to the Sacred Tree in the center of the sundance lodge. The sacred forked cottonwood tree is gathered in ceremony with songs and prayers and brought to sundance grounds. In the morning at sunrise a stake is driven into the ground to mark the center and another to point to where the door will be open to the sunrise each morning. On the tree is the Sacred Eagle, Keeper of Spirit. Also, there is the Sacred Buffalo, Keeper of the Circle of Life. In the Circle, the buffalo becomes part of us as it provides food to nourish our bodies. Also, in this circle, our bodies will return to the earth feeding the grass that when eaten by the buffalo will become our buffalo relatives. All plants and animals are part of our family on earth and our lives are all interdependent with one another in this Circle of Life.

The Paleolithic artists honored this sacred Circle of Life in their ceremonies and artwork, expressing radiant love, appreciation, and celebration in their cave paintings. The artists of many other ancient cultures adopted this same tradition throughout the history of humanity. I believe that contemporary artists also have a connection with this ancient tradition. I feel that an artist’s work results from a communal process that joins the artist with the power of their “muse,” or spirit helper. From this power springs the artist’s expression of whatever that connection inspires. This is the same power that inspired our ancestors to create their cave paintings thousands of years ago.

Paintings that are created without this relationship with a muse can still be beautiful objects or decorations. And yet, true art I believe includes this connection with these spirit helpers that inspired our Paleolithic ancestors. This path of Sacred Art is a honoring of the Circle of Life and becomes a type of nourishment to feed our souls.

Sacred Art also becomes a vehicle for stories that help us to understand the mysteries of life’s journey. Our ancestral storytellers told their stories at night around the fire that were an important part of the tribe’s life and an honoring of its history and mythology. The stories of Coyotee and other favorite animal powers communicated their messages of help for the tribe in all of its necessary and communal activities. The artful tales are very similar in the tribal traditions of various different peoples all over the world who still live close to nature.
Some stories are unchanged from thousands of years ago in places like Australia. For example, there are stories of how the raven, or other black-feathered birds, brought fire to the people from the sun and was turned black by the heat. The types of people and animals are very similar in tribal stories all over the world. They are an important guide to help the people live together in harmony with each other and their environment. The stories became the mythology of the tribal peoples.

We still need to have the mythical stories to connect us with our life journeys and guide us in our lives’ passages. An example of such a passage is a once dependent child becoming an independent adult and a parent of one of our future human family’s children.

Our tribal ancestors created initiation ceremonies to help their children move more comfortably into the more self sufficient time of their life. This major life passage was honored with a ceremony that helped the children feel more supported with the responsibilities and joys of becoming adults. Today, our children are left on their own trying to create the transition into an adult without the help and recognition of ceremonies. A guiding path to adulthood and the honoring of this life changing time needs to be brought back into our communities.
The more recent “creation myth” from our science teachers feels much different to me than our more comfortable ancient stories. The modern science myth may need to join with the older human myths to have a more workable and comprehensible path like our more ancient traditions. I am amused at how our scientific quantum physicists try to explain what came before the so-called “Big Bang” that “created the Universe.” To me, their explanation could be simplified by using the words of our ancestors who called Creation “The Great Mystery.” Also, if we all used the phrase “The Great Mystery,” it may remove the necessity of having wars to make one group’s or country’s potentially conflicting name for their creation deity, whatever it may be, conform to someone else’s name for it.

The scientific creation myth also seems to trigger different human emotions than do the stories of the ancient storytellers. Perhaps the joining of these old and new creation myths would serve to create more balance in our lives, rather than imbalance. The coming together of past and present in this way may also help our human family survive the many challenges we all experience in today’s world.

The great Swiss psychologist, Carl Jung, called the similar types of people and animals recognized in these ancient stories “archetypes.” He developed a method to treat and heal psychological illnesses using the archetypes found in the stories.
One of the earliest examples of such an archetype is the Great Earth Mother Goddess. The Paleolithic tribes carved the first sculpture of this voluptuous figure out of ivory. This archetype was a powerful part of the human psyche throughout history. Every culture had the sacred feminine as a primary energy of their mythology. She has many names in the old stories. A few of the names are Gaia, Isis, Aphrodite, Venus, Freya, and Mary. In our modern culture the names too are many, such as those of female movie stars, female characters in our novels, or pop singers. The modern use of this archetype is often used to sell various commercial products instead of awakening the Sacred Feminine in our culture and in ourselves. The reason the use of the Great Mother archetype can be used to advertise products is that it is in our genetic memory due to our ancestor’s honoring this energy in their ceremonies and works of art.

When I honor the Sacred Feminine in my artwork, I look to how our ancestors honored this archetype. I feel that the contemporary use of it to sell products is out of balance. I also feel that it is our responsibility as artists and storytellers to find a way to use this archetype to create harmony and balance in our lives, our environment and our world.

In the 60’s, I moved from a wilderness area in the Northwest to Malibu, California, where rock stars and filmmakers were beginning to appreciate my artwork. My Egyptian-styled pieces became especially popular. At that time, the Tutankhamun exhibit was touring for the first time in America and my jewelry was chosen to be in the museum gift shops where the exhibit was being displayed.

This exhibit premiered in Los Angeles and the CBS TV Special film crew came to my house and filmed my artwork. At the time, it was the largest viewed special in TV history. It was a wonderful opportunity to express the historical and present day importance of the Sacred Feminine archetype. As the camera closed in on the Isis statue, I read the prayer that is written on her temple in Egypt: “I, Isis, am all that has been, that is, or shall be; no mortal man hath ever me unveiled.”
When the exhibit was moved to the DeYoung Museum in San Francisco, one day I was delivering more Egyptian-styled jewelry to the gift shop there. It was in the early morning and I was allowed to go into the exhibit hall before it opened to the huge crowds that were attracted to it. I walked alone through some of the most powerful sacred artwork in the world. In the darkened room, the beautiful lighting illuminated the Golden Archetypes with which I was already very familiar. I felt like I was in an ancient Egyptian temple as I began to be drawn into a powerful meditation.

The DeYoung display of the ancient Egyptian sacred art had the same powerful energy as I felt in the Paleolithic painted caves and the great cathedrals in Europe. The natural art in Nature also holds this archetypal sacred energy for me. A rainbow after a gentle rain or a glowing sunset artistically set over a mountain or ocean touches the sacred for me.

Early in my career as an artist I wanted my artwork to touch me and other people in this same hallowed way. Also, I wanted it to continue to connect with future generations as ancient art had awakened a spiritual awareness in me as a young artist.

Later, the inspiration for my Isis statue came to me as I walked alone on the Malibu beach one evening. I drew the picture that had come to me when I got home. I realized that it was going to be the most extravagant creation of my career. About the same time, I was visiting a friend who had a votive candle burning on her altar of Our Lady of Guadalupe. It was such a sweet way of honoring the goddess, and I was quite taken with it. Also around the same time, I visited a neighbor and friend of mine for whom I had created several Egyptian-styled pieces. She also had an altar to Isis in her home that had one of my goddess crowns placed upon it.

Both of these altars of my friends made me realize that the newly completed Isis statue I had envisioned would not be my most expensive creation. Rather, she wanted to be placed on my own altar. I took some of the objects from that altar to make room for Isis in its center. I also began to do a daily morning ceremony in front of that altar before I started creating my artwork. It seemed the energy in my art pieces became steadily and noticeably more awakened.
Sacred Archetypes

The ancient archetypes were not merely a fantastic belief in the persona of a goddess Creatress. They were a way of explaining a part of our own personal energies. They recognized that within all humans there exists a Sacred Feminine aspect along with a Sacred Masculine aspect. Today, when we honor the feminine part of our consciousness we now have the privilege to call that power any of the names given to this archetype by our ancestors. I chose to call that part of my own Sacred Feminine psyche Isis.

When I majored in sculpture in my college-education days, they required me to take many art history classes. I think that this was so that along with being a studio artist, I would also be an academic artist. In studying the art of many ancient cultures, I found that many of those excited me a great deal more than did the work of more contemporary artists. My class in ancient Egyptian art was one of my favorites, and Isis became my primary goddess archetype.

As I traveled the world, I felt more comfortable to meditate and pray with the many local goddess archetypes. On one of my journeys through Greece I was in a sweet little chapel in Crete. A close friend had been recently diagnosed with multiple sclerosis and I went to the Mother Mary icon where many prayer candles burned. As I prayed for my friend and lighted a candle, I felt a healing power in the ceremony and it felt like the energy in my father’s Baptist Church service, the Sundance Lodge, and our group prayers in the Winter Solstice Ceremony at Machu Picchu Temple in Peru. I learned that the archetypes can open our hearts to the sacred healing energies anywhere in the world.

After living in the “Hollywood” community for seven years, I met the Crow Indian Sundance Chief on a trip to Montana. The next year I danced in the Crow Sundance and it was an incredibly powerful experience. I decided to leave the Hollywood lifestyle and move back to the Colville Indian Reservation in Washington State. There, I explored the Native American goddess archetype known as “White Buffalo Woman.” She merged into the Isis goddess and the statue became known to me as “White Buffalo Isis.”

I sundanced at the Crow reservation for over 30 years then decided to take some years off from dancing due to some physical challenges I was experiencing. Although I miss dancing, I still support the ceremony as an elder and help in the sundance itself in other ways.

The personal archetypal power of the Sacred Feminine is meant to be in balance with the Sacred Masculine. Like the goddess archetypes, he has many names throughout the history of our human family. He is celebrated in the many cultures that produced images of their gods.

Most ancient peoples realized that their local god images celebrated one part of our own psyche and symbolized that energy but were not a tangible portrayal of it. Michelangelo created a wonderful god image in the Sistine Chapel and I feel he understood that it was a representation of the Great Mystery in the Christian creation story. Other Sacred Masculine images are Thoth in Egypt, Dionysus in Greece, Bacchus in Italy, Archangel Michael in Christian Rome, and all have similar energies that pass with this archetype down through the great ages in human cultures.

I feel that the Sacred Feminine and Sacred Masculine were meant to manifest equally in a balance like the Taoist archetypal symbol of “yín” and “yang.” The Sacred Feminine is the energy of birth, the creative, and what we love. The Sacred Masculine is the energy, force, and action that can manifest the archetypal energies in our life and our human family.

I like the Native American teaching of how to use this sacred balance in the world. The action of our creations in our cultures should be measured with this sacred law. Our actions should look to the future and how our creations will affect our grandchildren for seven generations. If we create a war over our personal name of an archetype, that war may be killing our grandchildren for many generations. If the archetypes are seen as representations of our personal symbols of a similar psychic energy, in all humans, we may be able to stop the needless hate and wars that threaten to plague our grandchildren's future.

My personal male archetype is Cernunnos Buddha. Like Dionysus and Bacchus, Cernunnos is a male forest deity who has horns and, in northern Europe, his horns are deer antlers. The oldest artistic representation is from a bronze bowl from Denmark and he is sitting with his legs folded in a Buddhist Lotus posture. At that time in history Buddhist missionaries were spreading Buddhism into eastern Europe.

The Buddha is the awakened one who was able to see into the oneness of the universe. He spent the rest of his life teaching the awakened path of enlightenment. I chose the coming together of these two archetypes because of times in my life that I felt a moment of awakening to the oneness often happened in a forest or in a Buddhist meditation ceremony.
At this time in history we are connected with all the archetypes all over the world and also to the many historical spirit helpers. We have the opportunity to choose the ones that feel comfortable to us. The archetypes that we inherited from our families and communities may not work as well for us as the one we choose to bring us closer to our spiritual nature.

I definitely could feel the spiritual energy in my preacher father’s church, although found another path that worked better for me. The first time I sat in a Native American sweat lodge ceremony I felt closer to spirit. And when I became a sundancer, the connection was even stronger. Also, the teachings of Buddhism worked better for me than the teachings I inherited from my fraternal family.

So, I feel it is so wonderful that this time in history we can choose our own path with the archetypes that speak to us personally. They all represent the different energies that we need to bring into balance for our own highest good and the highest good of our communities and our world.
Story Telling with Shrines

On the cover is the Ganesha Shrine that I created for George Harrison. It counts among one of the most wonderful creations in my career as an artist. During his morning ceremony, at the altar in his home, George liked to burn incense and meditate, even though he spent a large part of his life traveling the world. He asked me to make a small Ganesha Shrine to be his ceremonial altar while journeying away from home.

For many years, I had been making sacred ceremonial artwork. However, this shrine took my creations into another dimension. George gave me a mantra [Eastern Indian Sacred Song] honoring Ganesha to sing as I worked on his shrine. He also told me some of Ganesha’s stories, like how Lord Brahma gave him the honor to be the first archetype to worship as we enter a temple. “The different gods were arguing about who should be the first to worship and Lord Brahma told them to race around the Universe to determine the winner. The gods jumped on their chariots and cosmic flying beings. Ganesha watched them leave and then climbed on his cosmic vehicle, which was a rat. He then walked around Lord Brahma and won the race, so becoming the first to be worshiped.

Finishing the ivory carving of Ganesha, and before starting on his small silver home, I was holding him in my hand. For several years, I had been doing a Native American ceremony over my artwork to “wake them up” and call Spirit into them. As I held Ganesha, I realized that he was already awake from my creative process that had preceded my customary ceremony.

I have often felt the life force in various sacred statues and paintings of archetypal powers. Also, I’ve felt how replicas of the same powers could feel lifeless. The Ganesha Shrine caused me to realize that I had touched my dream to be an artist that could also help to bring the spirit of our archetypal helpers into sacred art.

As a young artist in college, the art that spoke to me most deeply was the ancient art of our ancestors. I saw that the earliest paintings in Paleolithic caves, along with the first carvings of the Earth Mother Goddess, as well as all historical sacred art treasures, bequeathed a blessing to our human family. My art then began incorporating themes from various world mythologies while still trying to work within the modern styles of my college professors.

The early success of my work as a young artist brought me national recognition. As I tried to fit into the local artist community, something felt to me to be missing. While attending gallery cocktail parties where I was trying to market my artwork, I decided that only working in the popular style of contemporary art may not be a fulfilling life’s career.

I decided to move to a remote Indian reservation in the Pacific Northwest. Without electricity and other modern conveniences, I was able to live one of my childhood dreams. For several years I lived in the wilderness, growing my own food while being close to the natural rhythms of Nature. I continued making small jewelry pieces to sell at craft fairs and sacred art jewelry to be worn by my family and myself as ceremonial objects.

I noticed at the craft fairs I worked that many people were drawn to the necklaces my wife and I were wearing and I realized that there was indeed an interest in sacred art. I then began to create more artwork that depicted sacred archetypes and ceremony. Within a short time, some of the most famous people in the world were attracted to my work.

With the making of George’s Ganesha Shrine, I realized that I had become an artist in the ancient traditions of the Paleolithic caves, as well as all the great temples, pyramids and cathedrals of the world. The sacred stories of all our ancestors, through the sacred art they created, became my passion as I incorporated these wonderful traditions into my life. Delving deeper into these ancient traditions, I came to know that the archetypes in our sacred stories are not outside of us. They are the inner energies that show us our life’s purpose and how to relate to our communities. The sacred art sculptures, paintings and songs were there to help us through our life’s passages, adventures and challenges. That is why the stories and mythologies are similar all over the world.

The Goddess is not “out there,” but rather she is the part of us that is our sacred feminine. Nor is the God out there. He is the part of us that is our sacred masculine. All ancient and sacred archetypes are part of us and we are part of them because, truly, we are all one.

Traveling to other parts of the world allowed me to experience the sacredness of the various local shrines. As I walked in sacred sanctuaries in Tibet, Indonesia, Africa, Europe and South America, I found that all peoples have had similar ways of touching the sacred. Once an object or place becomes a shrine, it is honored regularly with ceremony. The more often these shrines are honored by the burning of incense or sweetgrass, or other kinds of offerings, the more powerful they become.

While staying for a time on the island of Bali, I experienced a culture that makes offerings frequently to their gardens, market places, homes and temples. Living in these sacred communities taught me how to create my own ceremonies that were more connected to all our ancestors and all of life.

Shrines do not have to be a silver and gemstone box with a goddess sculpture inside. A simple object like a stone or crystal may become a sacred helper. For me, my ceremonial pipe is my most sacred shrine. When my family lived in Malibu, a huge fire swept down the hills, burning 200 houses. There was only time to grab a few things and put my wife and children in the car to drive to the safety of the ocean beach. I ran into my studio and the first thing I grabbed was not my gold and gemstones; it was my sacred pipe. I realized in a flash that it was the most precious material object in my life.

Shrines can also be among the greatest works of art ever created. Marble carvings like Michelangelo’s Pieta are the most beautiful and powerful sacred shrines in the world. I was inspired to become an artist as a young man by Michelangelo’s work. This was several years before I had an understanding of the importance of sacred art.

I feel that sacred art is again becoming a type of nourishment that is necessary for people to live a full and meaningful life just as it used to be on our planet. The sacred stories are what helped historical communities, tribes, and nations survive and prosper. At this time in history, the mythologies of all people are merging to create a new mythology. Scientific, Asian, Tribal and Western traditions are blending together as our human family exchanges the stories that are now available to everyone.

We have a wonderful opportunity now to see what parts of all these stories no longer serve the higher good of humanity. Also, to see which parts are needed to bring well-being, health, and prosperity to the earth, its people, their children and their grandchildren for seven generations.
Paleolithic Shrine

Caves that have been exposed as a result of retreating glaciers have altar stones with bear skulls on them showing that shrines have been used for 200,000 years. The Paleolithic caves of Europe have paintings and statues of Gaia, the Great Earth Mother Goddess, that date back 30,000 years.

When I entered these caves I could still feel the sacredness of our ancestors’ ceremonies. The paintings of the animal powers that were bringing life to the people were high art that can stand beside any contemporary art. I could feel the honoring and appreciation our ancestors gave to the animals for giving their life so the tribe could live. It belittles our ancestors to say that they worshiped stone images or images painted on stone, just as we would not want someone to say that we worshiped only the written word “God.” These wonderfully creative cultures used the figures or paintings like we use words, as symbols when describing the mysteries.

These ceremonies are still within us in our genetic memory. If we do not have a way of connecting with our ancestors’ way of honoring life with ceremony, we feel like something is missing. Ceremony is a type of nourishment for which our spirit is hungry. Sacred shrines are a way of nourishing the void that many of us feel.
Paleolithic Shrine
Sun Dance

A friend took this picture as I was going into the sun dance lodge. The ceremony starts in the morning when a stake is placed toward the sunrise on the horizon. It takes all day to build the lodge with a forked cottonwood tree taken in a sacred way and placed in the center surrounded by twelve forked posts. Long Lodge Pole Pine trees are placed in the fork of the cottonwood tree like twelve spokes of a wheel. Small pine trees are placed around the outside circle with an opening in the East so the sunrise will come into the door for our morning ceremony. The men and women that have pledged to dance enter at sunset.

Fasting food and water for three days, we dance taking our prayers to the tree. On the third day people in the surrounding camp may come into the lodge for healing or blessing. They walk to the tree bare-footed like the dancers because the ground within the shrine is sacred. While touching the Sun Dance tree our Chief “doctors” the people with his healing eagle feathers. The last ceremony is taking a drink of the blessed water brought into the lodge by our grandmothers. We can feel the help that our ancestors bring to us, from the thousands of years the Sun Dance has brought healing to the Earth and her People.
Sun Dance
Mother Earth Father Sky

The inspiration for the Mother Earth Father Sky shrine came to me in the sundance lodge. While fasting food for a few days and dancing in the ceremony is not a significant challenge, fasting water can be excruciatingly painful. It was 114 degrees on the third day and I was overcome by the heat and dehydration, lying on the ground unable to move.

My grandmother brought me handful of mint from a nearby creek and the fragrance of the herb awakened my delirious mind making me feel keenly alert. I looked up at the eagle tethered to the branches of the sundance tree and the spirit of the eagle flowed into my body as I stood up feeling strong again. As I danced my prayers to the tree it was the most powerful experience of the ceremony.

When I drew a picture of what had happened to me in the sundance, the drawing was of Sky Father, the part bird and part man archetype. I decided to create a sculpture of the drawing although I felt that to make a balanced shrine, a sculpture of Mother Earth was also needed.

I choose White Buffalo Woman, the Native American archetype of Mother Earth. She is praying to the Great Mystery with the sacred pipe that she gifted to the people. Father Sky is the eagle, symbol of spirit, becoming man. As he touches the wheel of creation, the one spirit becomes many. In her ceremony, Mother Earth wakes up the winged, four-legged and two-legged spirits giving her children physical life.
Warriors of the Rainbow

There are many ancient prophesies among the Native American peoples concerning the times in which we are living. The indigenous tribes were not surprised when the black, white, and yellow peoples arrived on their shores, because their prophets had spoken of the coming of other races. They knew that the new tribes would overwhelm the ancient cultures of the land they called Turtle Island, until the spirit of the Indian would almost disappear.

In our time, the spirit of the Indians will be born anew into all of the races that have gathered in this land. A portion of each of the different races of the rainbow colors will see that we are all one family. They are called the "Warriors of the Rainbow."

This new community of mixed races and cultures will recognize that other humans are "all their relations." The Rainbow People are not called warriresses and warriors because they are waging war on other tribes. Rather, they are making war on the parts of themselves and their culture that are out of balance. In discovering the balance of the self, they will find harmony with all life. The Warriors of the Rainbow will bring with them a new time of living in harmony with our environment and with all peoples.
Warriors of the Rainbow
Michelangelo’s Pieta

As a young man in high school, I carved my first sculpture in art class and felt a deep connection with the process. About the same time I read a book about Michelangelo’s life and it made me want to live a similar life filled with passion. When my wood sculpture won first prize in the California Scholastic Magazine Art Show and went on to win the same in the national show in New York, I decided to make sculpture my major in college. After college, sacred art became my passion, and the focus of my life’s journey.

The masterpiece of Michelangelo’s youth was the Pieta, one of the greatest statues of sacred art in the world. It is much more than the story of Jesus’s death. It embodies the sorrow every mother has felt throughout all time at the death of her child. It is the archetypal depiction of a mother’s love and the indescribable pain of experiencing the loss of one’s child. I feel that no other sculptor has ever produced a better, or more profound, work.
Michelangelo’s Pieta
David

Another masterpiece by Michelangelo is his statue of David as a young man, who has gone into battle naked, with only his slingshot as a weapon. He has just slain the greatest enemy and won the war for his tribe. He stares frozen in disbelief at his accomplishment and also realizes he has killed another man.

The white marble sculpture is the archetypal image of a young man in his time of greatest strength, beauty and bravery. As young men, we all have times when we have to face our greatest challenges. Sometimes the challenges can lead to our death although we must face them with bravery and our learned skills.
David
Isis Shrine

The first major shrine came to me at a very dynamic time in my life, after a near death experience. A horse had fallen on me and broke my back. I moved out of the Northern Wilderness to the coastal town of Malibu, California while my body was healing.

It was a wild time in my life in general, living in the fast lane of Hollywood’s crazy life style. During a quiet evening walk along the ocean beach, I had an inspiration to create my ultimate masterpiece using all my skills as a sculptor and a jeweler. I designed a statue of the Egyptian Goddess Isis in the tradition of the great archetypes created in ancient cultures.

She may never be completed for I am still working on this symbol of the sacred feminine. At the time, my thought was to create the most opulent, expensive artwork of my career although she did not end up in a gallery for sale. She became the center of my ceremonial life on the altar in my studio.

This photograph of Isis was taken for the book “Sacred Art Sacred Earth”, twenty years after I created the statue. She is starting to show a few Native American influences after my dancing in the Crow Indian Sundance Ceremony for thirteen years.
Myth of Isis

This shrine celebrates my favorite myth from Egypt of the Great Goddess, Isis, and her mate, Osiris. He was slain by Set and his body chopped up and scattered down the Nile River. With the help of the jackal god, Anubis, Isis searches for and finds the pieces of Osiris’s body. She joins them together and sits upon the dead Osiris and conceives Horus, the Falcon God sacred to the Sun.

In the shrine arched over Isis’s head is her mother, Nut, goddess of the night sky with her sparkling diamond stars. On the door is the White Buffalo, symbol of the Native American goddess archetype. Isis holds in her hands the sacred peace pipe gifted to us from White Buffalo Woman.
In earlier times, statues were placed on the family’s altar and they were the center of attention for honoring the powers of creation. Often there was a flame nearby to celebrate the fire of creation and the smoke was used to clean and bless the home. Many contemporary people still use household altars as the center of their ceremonial life. The altar can be a focus for our mythical world and it enhances our relationship with the sacred powers of the universe. When we look into a majority of the houses in our mythically deprived modern world, the altar for most families seems to be the television set.

I made this altar shrine honoring the Egyptian Goddess, Isis. On the doors are Horus, the falcon who is sacred to the sun, and Thoth, the ibis, who is sacred to the moon. A small candle illuminates the shrine, in back of the statue and causes the quartz pyramid to glow. There is a place for incense on the doors to purify the ceremonial space of the person who has this symbol of the goddess on their altar.

Twenty years after this shrine was sold to a friend, he was moving to a smaller house and donated it to the newly completed Heyoka Studio Museum.
Anubis is the ancient Egyptian gatekeeper of the underworld. He is the Black Jackal, or Coyote, who guides us each night as we journey in the dream world. Our dreams try to connect us with the unconscious parts of our psyche that needs to be healed or awakened.

During sleep, the dream spirit elders teach us with their opulent symbolic dialogue if we open ourselves to their wisdom. This sculptured archetype sits next to my bed as my dream "Kachina" or guide.
Anubis
Lady of the Lake

The water goddess awakens the potential that sleeps within the quiet mirror of the lake that is our unconscious mind. Viviane, the high priestess of Britain, was the earthly manifestation of the Goddess and she was called the Lady of the Lake.

Sovereignty and kingship could be bestowed only by the high priestess. The women of Avalon forged the magic sword Excalibur and gave this sword of kingship to Arthur.

This story resonates strongly in us because it speaks in the language of the archetypal powers that are a part of our Western culture.
Lady of the Lake
Diana

Diana the Huntress is the triple goddess: Virgin, Mother, and Crone. Chaste Diana is the Virgin Goddess of the Forest, the potential of all life. As the Nurturer, she is the mother of all animal powers. Diana is also the Huntress who slays the King Stag and gives his blood to the earth so he may be reborn through Diana's children, the trees.

We all go through the transition of death, and our life's journey embraces all aspects of the goddess. We are born with limitless potential. We have the power to nurture our children and help them grow into their life's purpose. In the autumn of our life we become the elders passing on our gathered wisdom so it may be reborn within our children.
Diana
I see the necklaces I create as wearable shrines, and my first shrine to Diana was this necklace. The Queen of Heaven, or Sacred Huntress, is called Artemis by the Grecians, and Diana by the Romans. Diana is also called “Diana of the Grove” and she is celebrated within the sacred groves. The priests of Diana are known as King of the Wood or the King Stag.

Contemporary culture seems to be uncomfortable with goddesses that are also warrioresses. In fact, the word warrioress is not even in my computer’s spell check or my dictionary. The image in our mythology, passed down to us by most historians, is of the Goddess as the fertility and mother aspect of womankind. In Diana, her more dynamic aspect as The Huntress has survived. She retains her rightful role as The Great Goddess, the embodiment of strength and power.
Warrioress
Epona

On a green hillside near Uffington, England, there is the famous 370-foot chalk-cut image of the White Mare. Epona, goddess of the white horse was honored all over Europe. In Greece, she was the mare-headed Demeter whose destroyer aspect was the Black Mare or Nightmare. The Mare Goddess was the title applied to the queen of the Amazons, the Goddess-worshiping tribes that held influence from North Africa to Northern Europe.

Ceremonies to Epona existed in England up to 1826, with Lady Godiva’s naked ride through town on a white horse in the spring. In the Goddess’s May-Eve procession, she would renew her virginity, consummate the sacred marriage, and provide the blessings of fertility for the coming year. In the nursery rhyme “Ride a Cock-Horse,” she is called the “fine lady on the white horse.”

In this necklace, you may take a look at the negative space in front of the goddess’s face to see a spirit horse.
Epona
The people inhabiting the Caribbean Islands call the Ocean Mother Goddess “Yemaya.” She traveled to the New World when her people were taken from Western Africa and enslaved. She is called different names by the various tribes of the world and her power reaches up the great rivers where offerings and prayers are given to her as the bringer of abundance and prosperity. Similar ceremonies honor Yemaya from Brazil to Indonesia. At the Summer Solstice, offerings of food, flowers and gifts are put on small, decorated boats and then launched into the Sea.

My Western African medicine brother, Malidoma Somé, and the people of his tribe, the Dagara, worship Yemaya by the name “Mammy Wata”. When I lived near the Columbia River, he and his wife, Sobonfu, visited me during the Summer Solstice so we did a ceremony of prosperity to Yemaya. We made a little boat filled with offerings and gave it to the river to take to the goddess of the sea.
Yemaya
Freya

In Northern Europe, the leader of the Divine Grandmothers, or Primal Matriarchs, is the Great Goddess Freya. She is the ruling ancestress of the elder gods, teacher of Odin in the arts of magic and divine power.

The twin brother of Freya is Frey, the god of Yule, in the “pagan” (which means the way of the people of the land) festival at Winter Solstice. As the shortest day ends and the days begin to become longer, he is born of the virgin-sister-mother-bride.

The fifth day of our week is named in Freya’s honor. She is associated with love, and it is still considered auspicious by some to be married on Friday (Freya’s Day).
Freya
White Buffalo Woman

Long ago two young men were crossing the plains in the center of the land they called Turtle Island, which we now have named America. They saw a person approaching them from a distance, and soon they could see she was a beautiful woman dressed in white buckskin. She held a pipe in her hands and taught them to honor everything in the universe, when tobacco is put into the pipe. The pipe was to be an altar and the center of their ceremonies. As the woman walked away, she turned into a white buffalo.

Statistically it is very rare for buffaloes to be born white in color and yet there have been about fifty born around the world in the past twenty years. Many people see this as a sign that the power of White Buffalo Woman, along with her teachings of the path of peace, is being made available to us now.
White Buffalo Woman
White Spirit Keepers

It is many winters since you came

Gifting us with the sacred teachings

Showing us how we can use a pipe

As an altar for sending blessings

Our voice within smoke made visible

Words reaching out touching everything

The sacred chanunpa bringing peace

Your wisdom drifting across our world

Coming alone from endless prairie

Walking, changing, a white buffalo

You’re returning at a special time

As many white spirit animals

Medicine coming, East South West North

A blessing for people everywhere

The gift of White Buffalo Woman

Here now again for our open hearts
White Buffalo
Archangel Michael

Archangel Michael is the Spirit of Light within the luminous sphere of the sun. He is holding the Caduceus, his staff entwined with two snakes. The two snakes represent the spiral Kundalini energy rising up our spinal column. This staff of healing originates in Ancient Egypt with Thoth, the archetype of healing. The stories of Michael continued to be passed down from Egypt through the ages to be respected as Hermes, Mercury, and Heimdall.

In Cabbalistic teachings Michael is called “Like Unto God.” In biblical stories, he was the leader of the angelic army during the war in heaven. With “Words of Power” he defeated the rebellious troops and propelled them down into the underworld.

Archangel Michael connects us with the light of healing that we all have available to us. Sometimes the most important healing we need is that of our Sacred Warrior, confronting our addictions, depressions, or inactivity.
Archangel Michael
Bacchus

In ancient Rome, during the autumn harvest, the god of wine and celebrations would have his yearly ceremony. Riding on a donkey, Bacchus would parade through the village preceded by the Bacchanalias, the women of the tribe playing musical instruments, dancing and carrying grape vines.

In Greece, the god of wine was called Dionysus, the archetype of the love of partying and celebration. Every evening as I enjoy a glass of wine with dinner, I honor the fruit of the year it was bottled. I also feel the spirit of Bacchus every New Year’s Eve party as we dance to my favorite Montana band, The Drum Brothers, surrounded by ecstatic Bacchanalias.
Babaji

I was asked to create this shrine to Babaji, the Hindu Saint, for a young man upon his graduation from college. Babaji was the teacher of Paramahansa Yogananda and many other Eastern Indian holy people.

For thousands of years he has lived in the Himalayas, teaching generations of Indian Yogis and Yoganis. He reflects the part of us that longs to be a teacher in our elder years and pass on the spiritual wisdom accumulated during our lives.
Babaji
Ganesha Necklace

When I realized that all of my necklaces were sacred shrines, I decided to make a small version of George's traveling shrine. Using the same design, I created a small replica of it, with the Ganesha archetype inside.

A ceremony is part of the creative process with which I empower each necklace. Many people that have my necklaces have told me they feel the archetypal power in the sacred art piece. I believe that this was the original reason for wearing a necklace and not for mere adornment. This is found in the earliest examples of necklaces found in Paleolithic archeological sites. Often they are shaped like the animal powers or totems that were our ancient ancestors' spirit animal helpers.
Ocean Mother’s Song

People often ask me where I get my inspirations and I’m not sure where they originate – they just happen. I like the Greek way of talking about inspiration, which is that goddesses, or the muses, bring us our artistic visions.

A few years ago, I wrote a novel about a young dolphin and her adventures and life’s journey in Mother Ocean. It took me about half a year to finish the book, and by then I was exploding with a passion to create a new art piece. I began to design a shrine and, as I continued, all the characters from the new book decided to be a part of it. Path Finder, the conch shell who was the young dolphin’s first teacher; Ocean Thunder, the singing whale; and Guardian, the orca all appeared in it. The piece eventually incorporated all these familiar friends, and more, who had been living in my imagination for the past six months.
Ocean Mother's Song
Our Lady of Guadalupe

For three hundred years, Virgin Mary of Guadalupe in her Mexican invocation has been celebrated. The famous image of Mary has transcended the bounds of religion and institution to become an iconic folk symbol of the goddess that unifies and protects. To her devotees, she is gentle, serene, powerful and protective. They turn to her as they would to a mother, guide, and protectress.

The narrative about this archetype says that a Christianized Aztec, Juan Diego, saw the Virgin Mary four times on his way to mass. A beautiful woman surrounded by a body halo appeared to him with the music of songbirds in the background. She appeared at the site of a temple to the Aztec goddess Tonantzín and announced, “I am the Entirely and Ever Virgin, Saint Mary.” Assuring the Indian peasant, she said that she was his “Compassionate Mother coming out of her willingness to love and protect all folk of every kind.”
Our Lady of Guadalupe
Condor Shrine

The Inca culture has always intrigued me so I traveled to the sacred valley in Peru to do a ceremony at Machu Picchu during the Winter Solstices. The indigenous Quechua people of the valley are descended from the ancient Incas and have kept alive many of the sacred teachings. They have a prophecy that in our time “the eagle of the north will join in ceremony with the condor of the south.” I felt an incredible love for the people, temples and ceremonies in the valley and felt very much a part of the ancient prophecy. I have returned several times for the solstice ceremony and the sacred valley feels like it has become one of my homes.

On the way to Machu Picchu, we visited one of my favorite shrines in the village of Ollaytaytambo. The temple is a natural rock formation shaped like a condor, with steps cut into the rock leading to a ceremonial platform. A friend snapped this picture while I was sitting in meditation in the shrine.

From this village, we took a train along the river and at the end of the valley, on a high pinnacle, is Machu Picchu. Truly, it is one of the most beautiful temples in the world.
Condor Shrine
Machu Picchu

Clouds burning with the fire of sunset
Into the Sacred Valley
Mountains with stairways of the giants
Leading to the sky
Jungle clad cliffs soar upward with the Wings of condors
An eagle’s nest temple of stone gifted to us
By our grandparents
Masonry walls growing out of the bare bones
Of the pinnacle
The art of building, the beauty of nature join
In holy marriage
Gigantic hand hewn rocks growing together like
Clusters of crystals
On green peaks, a golden city vision now frozen
Into time and space
Celebrate a sacred union of the earth and sky
Within the shrine
An ancient sanctuary surrounds the ceremony
To the winter solstice
Eagle of the north and condor of the south dance
With children of the sun
Lost city of the Incas, Machu Picchu, heavenly home,
Heart of the Andes
Machu Picchu
Little Sleeping Child Mountain

After spending a lot of time in Peru and among its people, I have been touched by the teachings of their shamans. The Quechua tribal people who inherited the great Incan mythology honor the mountains with ceremonies of the local “Apus” [mountain spirits]. The Apus are given names and certain ones are called by the entities they resemble like the Condor Shrine.

When I moved to the Bitterroot Valley I was very attracted St. Mary’s Mountain above my home. My little town was the first non-Indian settlement in Montana. A white community formed around a Jesuit mission church and I thought that St. Mary’s Mountain must have an older Indian name. This mountain became a sacred shrine to me because of the influence from my Quechua friends in Peru.

One day I saw a silhouette figure along the mountain ridge and realized it was a “Little Sleeping Child”. I knew the name instantly when I saw the figure, for at the end of our valley is a healing hot springs called Little Sleeping Child. It seemed to me that it was named after this sacred Apus. There are two waterfalls flowing into a pool, one hot and one cold and I am sure the hot springs have been a sacred healing shrine for thousands of years.
Little Sleeping Child Mountain
When I first moved to Montana, a young man who had seen my art book asked to apprentice with me and he went on to make jewelry his career. His wife worked with the local Buddhist community and I became interested in a huge shrine they were planning to build. A Tibetan, Tulku Sang-ngag Rinpoche, was teaching in Montana and saw a valley that was in his vision as a young man. His vision was to create a shrine incorporating one thousand buddhas.

A sheep ranch was bought in which to build the shrine in the Jocko Valley that is part of an Indian reservation. When we were sitting in the small ranch house talking about the casting of 1000 buddhas, I was not sure we could do such a huge task. Years of hard work later it is finished, with 1000 buddhas blessings at the garden. The eight-spoked Dharma wheel on which the statues sit is 340 feet across and surrounded with 1000 stupas. In the center is a 24-foot high statue of Yum Chenmo “the Great Mother.” When the beautiful statue was almost finished, I had the honor of setting a gemstone in the Great Mother’s forehead.

Having traveled in Tibet and Nepal, I feel this is one of the most beautiful Tibetan shrines in the world. The local Native American community has welcomed the Garden of One Thousand Buddhas and the elders come to speak at our large gatherings. This peace shrine has become one of the major pilgrimage sites on this continent, and the Dalai Lama has said he would like to come to Montana and bless what the Native American community calls our Medicine Wheel.
Garden of One Thousand Buddhas
Earth & Sky Temple

About 37 years ago I formed the nonprofit Earth & Sky Circle to help support my apprentice program, and also to create a sacred space for my community to do ceremony together in a teepee. Over the years, I have mentored over 100 apprentices on the path of the sacred artist.

In the year 2000, I started construction of a temple where we could gather for ceremony and it may have become my greatest art piece. I am still working on this temple in which I do ceremony every morning and continue to host many sacred gatherings. The sacred archetypes honored inside the 3-story high pyramid are from Ancient Egypt, Native America, South America, Asia, and Europe.

I incorporated sacred geometry into the making of the Earth & Sky Temple and labored to have the same energetic feeling in it that I experienced in the painted Paleolithic caves, the great cathedrals and other ancient temples around the world. Joining me in ceremony over the years have been many small children who now still participate in our circle when they are home from college. The Temple has been a wonderful help to me in my continued growth toward being a spiritual elder and it has lovingly embraced many visitors with its sacred touch.
Earth & Sky Temple
Cernunnos Buddha

In the north side of the Temple is a grotto I created to hold the Temple Isis statue. She almost seemed too small and lost when placed in it. In my home, I had a wooden statue of the Buddha carved in Indonesia that I blessed often with sweet grass when I meditated near it. I tried setting him in the grotto and he loved it so much he has been there ever since.

The first image of a male deity in Northern Europe was the Celtic god Cernunnos. He is a forest god with deer antlers and is shown sitting in a yogic lotus posture. I have a set of antlers shed by a deer that I found when I lived on the Columbia River near Canada. At the Spring Equinox, I went to a spot where I could see the Northern Mountains to do ceremony and at my feet were the two antlers.

I felt an affinity with this Celtic archetype since I spend as much time as possible in the forest so I decided to give the antlers I’d found to the Buddha. He felt very pleased with my gift so my male archetype became Cernunnos Buddha, the awakened forest deity.

There are several synchronicities that occurred unplanned when the Temple was built. One of my favorites is that the Winter Solstice sunrise comes through the temple’s east facing door and illuminates the grotto.
Cernunnos Buddha
Scarab

The ancient Egyptians chose the Scarab Beetle as the symbol of rebirth and resurrection. The male beetle attracts a female by pushing a ball of dung along the desert floor. The female lays her eggs inside the ball then buries it in the ground. The newborn scarabs come out of the ball as beautiful green iridescent adult scarabs. The Egyptians saw this as a metaphor for the birth into the world of spirit after our bodies return to the earth.

The old name for Egypt was Land of the Black Soil. Every year the monsoon rains in the central rain forests of Africa would cause a great flood. The flood would bring moist rich fertile black soil down to the dry desert lands to fertilize and water the Egyptians’ crops. They knew where to plant their seeds because the scarabs would bury their eggs where the edge of the flood would reach each year. Thus, scarabs were also sacred to the rebirth of the earth. This stained glass scarab window is in the East of the Temple facing the morning sunrise.
Quetzalcoatl

Coatl is the sacred snake whose movements mirror the way that Kundalini energy moves up the spinal column awakening the wheels of light that surround each of the major body energy centers, or “chakras.” When this serpentine energy reaches the crown chakra at the top of the head, we are one with the Universal, or “All That Is.” Quetzal is the sacred bird that connects Earthly power with the Heavenly realms of the universe. Together, the Quetzal and the Coatl are the creatures that are closest to the earth and heaven as well as representing the sacred balance of female and male.

This is the teaching within the name Quetzalcoatl, the teacher/savior deity to the Mayan and other Mexican peoples. According to Mayan tradition, this deity returns at specific times to instruct humanity again. According to the Mayan calendar, we are now in the time when Quetzalcoatl is returning, and many people are expecting a savior to rescue us from all our problems.

For me, Quetzalcoatl is a power that is awakening within every human. If we look inward instead of outward for a savior, we all have the potential to become the winged serpent that is Quetzalcoatl.

Next to Quetzalcoatl is Divine Grandmother, or Lady of the Serpent Skirts, Great Goddess of the Aztecs and Mayans.
Quetzalcoatl
Tribal people everywhere celebrate animal spirit helpers and many feel that there is one primary animal power that guides and protects each one of us in our life’s journey. Many believe this to be a superstition of primitive people, yet most of us have a particular attraction to an animal. If we look at our favorite animal, we may see parts of ourselves that resemble that animal and the way it relates to the world.

As I learned about animal powers, I began to notice that my encounters with them often held a sacred teaching. Some of the animals in my most amazing meetings also became my family of helpers. In one such meeting, I was building my booth for an art show in a beautiful forest and gathering a tall stick from a bush. I was feeling relaxed and blissful coming out of the city into a natural environment.

An overzealous security guard at the show shouted at me “you’re out of bounds!” Seized with a rush of anger, which was fast becoming a profanity to yell back, the anger materialized out of the bush as a rattlesnake flying toward my knee with it’s fanged mouth open. Somehow, I managed a 6-foot backwards broad jump, as the jaws snapped shut where my knee had been. This taught me that the wild animals in my environment could sense my emotional feelings.

Having had many similar encounters like this one with the rattler, I honor animals as my teachers and as my helpers. Like the northwest coastal tribes have done for a long time, I designed and had a friend carve a totem pole to be placed in front of the Earth & Sky Temple that shows my primary animal powers.
Totem Pole Shrine
Temple Isis

As my friends and I built the pyramid temple I had difficulty sleeping because my mind constantly streamed inspirations from my muses or spirit helpers. It is now forty years since I created this Temple Isis statue, the goddess symbol of the sacred feminine. Since I first sculpted the shrine, she has taken on many of the attributes of the Native American goddess archetype, White Buffalo Woman. It seems this White Buffalo Isis statue helped to create the temple that grew up around her. Now, she has this Egyptian pyramid temple filled with sacred archetypes from all over the world as her home.

My primary myth is the Sun Dance and other Native American traditions, although I have been blessed with many mythologies in my life’s journey. As I traveled in the Himalayas, Andes, Africa, and Europe, the sacred wisdom of people everywhere touched me and I feel that this Temple Isis Shrine joins together the Great Goddess energies of east and west.
Earth & Sky Temple Reborn

As I was writing this book, I noticed that the south windowed roof section of the Temple sagged inward a few inches. Realizing that it could be collapsing, a friend helped me to build a steel support that solved the problem. As we worked on the repair, I noticed that rusted holes had appeared in the Temple’s metal roof where it had been mounted by screws to the underlying frame. I realized that the wonderfully high humidity created by the plants and irrigation system in the temple caused the screws to rust and that they had to be replaced to save the roof.

These structural problems created a year of unplanned construction repairs that completely transformed the Earth & Sky Temple. Although I very much miss the passive solar greenhouse-like environment and my dear and plentiful plant friends, the Temple’s ceremonial area was greatly enlarged. I now realize that one of life’s difficulties just created an opportunity for us to gather more people together at any one time in the Temple for ceremony. Like the pheonix the temple is now reborn.
Earth & Sky Temple Reborn
Swans were chosen to be the keepers of dreams. In ancient Greece, they were symbolic of the Muses or Spirit Helpers who brought through artists, inspiration from the dream world. From this inspiration came the visions and passion to be creative. The swans are carved from the black southsea pearl’s mother shell and the green stones are moltivite, a meteorite that fell from the sky onto the earth.
Sacred Muses
Jewel in the Lotus

Om Mani Padme Hum (The Jewel in the Lotus) refers to when Siddartha Gautama Buddha held a lotus flower in his hand to express what was beyond the embrace of the mind. He had just awakened to the fullness of Creation and like the life within the flower, the life within a newborn child, or the life within a sunset can bring us close to that Awakened or Buddhist place of Oneness. He realized that Enlightenment could not be described to the young monks and only the path toward Awakening could be taught.
Jewel in the Lotus
Phoenix Rising

The myth of the Phoenix says that at the beginning of a New Age, the Phoenix hatches from the egg within a fiery nest. The burning nest symbolizes the passing of the old way, and the birth of the new way. Today, this symbol speaks strongly to us, for we are witnessing the birth of a new cycle.

Below is an ancient Egyptian hieroglyphic drawing of the phoenix bird contained in one of the Temple’s decorations. It shows the feather tufts on the upper part of the head that have represented the phoenix throughout history. The necklace contains it, as does the Great Seal of the United States. Many of our country’s Founding Fathers belonged to the fraternity of Freemasons that often used the ancient symbolism of our ancestors in their artwork and ceremonies. I believe that they likened the birth of the new United States of America to the mythological rebirth of the phoenix from the ashes.
Walking the Earth

For seventy seven times around the Sun, I have been walking the Earth. It is a wonderful opportunity, experiencing this delightful planet. It seems also that we chose this journey knowing it has many difficult challenges and the walk will someday end.

My first experience with an ending is when my best friend in the third grade in East L.A. was hit by a truck and killed. Another ending happened while cycling with a college brother down the highway in Southern Italy when a car ran through a stop sign into my friend.

As I start to write these pages today I feel, after several years, the end may be coming again in a relationship with my dear sweet lover. In this Earth walk there have been many similar endings with my wife and friends and lovers. If this is a closure, perhaps I have learned a few more lessons of how to love, share and experience life dancing with the Sacred Balance. As an artist, most of my love relationships have been with the many muses that have been attracted to my desire and passion to be an artist. My lovers that walk the Earth with me have always had to accept the fact that relations with me are not alone, as I surround myself with many muses/spirit helpers. Although the muses are in the world of spirit, they often compete with my Earth lovers, making long term relationships difficult. Although I have tried to create long term relationships, I celebrate the privilege at spending a time with the amazingly wonderful women who have shared with me this Earth journey.

Although the life as an artist also comes with an amazing amount of challenges, I feel blessed to have chosen this journey in this lifetime. The fear of an economic collapse when I go for months without selling an artwork also makes for the joy of a major sale when it arrives. Worrying about a creative block will eventually visit my seemingly never-ending inspirations that bless my creativity. Also, there’s trying to find a new artistic direction that no other artist has found, or awakening a new twist to a loved historical artist and continuing to carry on the torch of their inspiration. I feel that the challenges we are gifted in our Earth Walk are part of our teachings that we came to learn from. I believe that our Mother Earth is among the most beautiful and sought after collages in our Spiral Galaxy.

I hope that the humans who have been attracted to this school will learn soon that all life forms on Earth are important teachers. Too many humans seem to think it would be better if all other life forms disappear. They think other life forms are just in the way of their Earth Walk. They are so removed from the natural world that they seem to care less about whether many forms of life are collapsing. More species of life are now disappearing than they were during the age of dinosaurs. I believe the many types of life may be necessary for humans to survive on Earth. Personally, I would suffer a broken heart if most of the beautiful and diverse species of life were to collapse.

A Meditation

Escaping the sub-zero winter in Montana, I’m in the Hawaiian Islands and the final pages of this book are being inspired during this wonderful time in paradise. I awaken before daylight and the full moon is reflected on the dark Ocean Mother making a shimmering path toward me. Gazing out to the horizon I sat down to watch the moon set.

The pounding surf carries me into a deep meditation as the full moon sets in the west and the sun rises in the east. The Mother Ocean is roaring like a lion as her waves crash into the rocks along the shore on Maui Island. It feels like it is the echo of the heartbeat of her immense body that surrounds our Earth and the rising and falling swells are reflections of her breathing. She thunders into my meditation, taking me deeper within the inner quiet.
As I descend into the sacred quiet of meditation, I enter down into the island where the morning sunrise cannot touch. The wonderful blackness begins to glow as I descend deeper into the Earth like roots stretching for life. A beautiful red glow surrounds me as I enter into the living body of Mother Pele. The Volcano Goddess/Creatress welcomes me, mother of the beautiful island I sit upon. The red glow reaches up to my tailbone, awakening my root chakra, a wheel of light within my body, connecting me to the goddess of the Hawaiian Islands.

The red glow rises up my back into another wheel of light, becoming the orange glow of sacred sexuality. It is life reaching for more life to continue the creation bliss of our mother. In the orange glow all life becomes part of our mother of creation.

As the orange glow turns yellow it becomes the mind of my entire being. It overwhelms the part of my mind in my head that thinks it is control of my body. The little chatter in my head slowly grows completely quiet as my entire mind awakens. I enter deeper into the wonderful silence of meditation.

The yellow glow fades into the green light of compassion opening my heart into an ocean of love and bliss. With my heart opened, I would like to share this openness with all sentient beings.
Wishing to share this openness, the light turns blue expanding up toward my neck chakra. With the blue wheel of light illuminated, I feel the desire to communicate and to try to write down these words, even as it becomes amazingly more difficult to describe the place I am in.

As the blue light turns to purple, a newly awakened eye opens in my forehead chakra, revealing a view into the world of spirit. Words of description fail me as the experience expands in all directions.

The upward movement of the light continues to the top of my head and my crown chakra as its color becomes white. The white light spreads into uncountable beams, like the sun that gifts us each day with its life giving rays.

The white light wants to be joined to the black in the earth that appeared in the beginning of this journey. As they join in my heart, the lights become a rainbow. The rainbow becomes a sphere of colored light surrounding my heart. It expands to hold me inside a glowing rainbow in all directions and then the rainbow sphere encircles the Hawaiian Islands. Growing larger, it surrounds our Planet Earth.

It continues to embrace our solar family of planets, asteroids, and comets. The rainbow sphere reaches out to surround our Mother Spiral Galaxy. Expanding greater, it envelops All That Is. Words cannot describe Creation, although my awareness of the rainbow spheres started with a feeling of love, bliss and kindness in my heart. With judgment ceasing to exist I feel unlimited compassion for All That Is.

From this place and feeling of oneness, I start returning back into my consciousness as the rainbow spheres grow smaller until the rainbow surrounds my heart again. Now I have returned to my body sitting on Maui Island with a glowing smile on my face.

A Storyteller’s Myth

I feel that the Sacred Void, our first Great Mother, was the dark womb that held the power of birthing All That Is. Out of the endless dark universe she caused the first, greatest, loudest sound ever in eternity. Out of the darkness and the immense boom of thunder a great bolt of lightning shot through the darkness birthing the Great Mystery. This first sound and first light made possible the potential of all forms of life to be birthed.

Many ages ago our Father Sun began collecting himself into a sphere of glowing, radiant light. The gasses and elements started cooking together in an atomic fire, exploding parts of himself into a family of planets. They danced in a circular orbit around his body.

Our Mother Earth began life as a globe of molten rock spinning as she traveled the path around Father Sun. Her intense heat was traveling through the incredible cold of empty space. The cold touching the immense heat of Mother Earth caused condensations to be born on her surface. They grew and grew, becoming an ocean of deep water surrounding large areas of her body. The birthing of Mother Ocean soon covered most of our Mother Earth.

Father Sun sent his rays deep into Mother Ocean, impregnating her with the first biological life. The small beings of life started gathering together to form larger and larger creations. Some became plant beings and some became the early animals.

As the Mother Earth's surface became cool and solid, the large islands of land were born. The plants and animals started watching the islands and wanted to move out of the ocean onto the land. After another age, many plants and animals had relatives living on the land breathing air instead of water.
The Great Mystery Spirit was living in Mother Earth and all of the life forms that she created. Every being had a small part of Great Spirit within it. Every part of that spirit would return into the Great Mystery when a physical being's body died and would be reborn again into the many creations that were coming to life on Mother Earth. After another age, the people came into being. First were the whales and dolphins in Ocean Mother and, later on the land islands, the humans. All people, animals and plants are related and our original parents are our Mother Earth and the Great Mystery.

All plants, animals and people were created to live together as a family, holding the place in creation appointed by their parents. It is the intention of our life’s journey to find out what gift we were meant to bring to our relations. I feel Sacred Art became my path, and that we all have a special gift to bring to creation that will benefit the whole of those relations. When we discover our gift, we are met to see how it can benefit our family for seven generations.
You may be wondering: What is my purpose as I walk my path on planet Earth? If we lose our connection with the whole of creation it becomes difficult to find our special gift from the Great Mystery that we brought as a give-away for our family. The clearer our vision becomes into the whole of creation the easier it is to find the sacred path to our purpose. Follow your heart while exploring your favorite paths in life until one creates amazing joy for you, and then dive into its ocean of bliss.

The Beginning

Thank you for letting me share my stories and artwork with you. May there be Love, Joy and Good Medicine for all of us on our own Earth Walks.
Acknowledgments

I strive to be a storyteller, and with a little help from my friends, a writer. The correct rules of the English language are way over my head and I am very thankful for the editing of “The Path of Sacred” Art by Terry Croghan. The book design and computer work are by KJ Kahnle and Jason Gutzmer. The photographs are by myself, and several friends, including; Karl Cordes, Jim VanGundy, Kirt Anderson, Zig Jackson, Natalie Obolenska, Remi Gitts, and KJ Kahnle.
Epilogue

The last photograph shows my traveling shrine. Like George did, I also spend much of my time traveling away from my home’s sacred space. I encourage you to create a shrine in your home with which you can spend a quiet time each day. You may light a candle or burn incense to show appreciation for the gift of life from our Mother Earth and Father Sky. Prayers may be sent to friends, family or people anywhere experiencing difficult challenges and also you may send healing to our earth’s challenged environment. It can be as simple as a shelf with a special photo, painting or object that holds a sacred meaning for you.

For me, it started with a small shelf dedicated to sacred archetypes, and over the years it grew into a temple. Finding the ancient path of the sacred artist has filled my life with joy, excitement and reverence. My path led me to create the Earth & Sky Circle as I taught sacred art to over 100 apprentices and created ceremonies for my community. Earth & Sky Circle is a nonprofit 501(c)(3) spiritual and charitable organization. If you have enjoyed my book, you may show your appreciation with a donation to help support our apprenticeship program and continuing ceremonies.

Thank you for joining me and witnessing my life’s journey into the world of sacred art and shrines. Feel free to share “The Path of Sacred Art” with your friends and community.

Good medicine to you,

Heyoka

Donate now via Pay Pal
www.EarthAndSkyCircle.com
Earth & Sky Circle
(click or scan QR code)
Heyoka’s Studio Gallery and the Earth and Sky Temple
Heyoka Merrifield is a celebrated multi-media artist, medicine man, and author living in western Montana. Searching for the reason ancient art pieces radiated inner life and power has led him on a lifelong quest of learning. Touching the sacred within his work has brought him international acclaim, and his pieces appear in private collections around the world, including those of Cher, Elton John, George Harrison, Joni Mitchell and Neil Diamond. He has authored: Sacred Art Sacred Earth, the White Buffalo Woman trilogy, and Ocean Mother's Song.

“In his art, ceremonies and stories, Heyoka is touching into the radiance of creation.”
– Neale Donald Walsch: Author of Conversations with God.

“Heyoka Merrifield is a medicine man, a priest, a guardian of the doorways and a powerful conduit to the understanding of the complex intricacies between our world and the world of the spirits and the ancestors. This position at the threshold between worlds underscores the exquisiteness of the art coming out of his hands and the halo of humbling spiritual energy surrounding him. Every piece he makes is a ritual puzzle that encodes a healing message from the other world. We cannot afford to ignore his message.”

– Malidoma Some, Ph.D.: Of the Dagara tribe in West Africa, author of, Healing Wisdom of Africa and Of Water and the Spirit

Heyoka Merrifield is a celebrated multi-media artist, medicine man, and author living in western Montana. Searching for the reason ancient art pieces radiated inner life and power has led him on a lifelong quest of learning. Touching the sacred within his work has brought him international acclaim, and his pieces appear in private collections around the world, including those of Cher, Elton John, George Harrison, Joni Mitchell and Neil Diamond. He has authored: Sacred Art Sacred Earth, the White Buffalo Woman trilogy, and Ocean Mother's Song.

Heyoka Merrifield
P O Box 70, Stevensville, MT 59870
406-777-7006
heyoka@heyoka-art.com
www.heyoka-art.com